One thing we're definitely missing is a robust and inspired community of developers.

Bitcoin obviously has that because of its adoption and the way it first ignited people's imagination about what blockchain could do. Ethereum has that because tremendous effort was put into communicating the idea that it was a programmable blockchain that could make anyone's distributed application real.

We don't have that.

That will likely change over time. Yes, Ripple and XRP have been around for years, but you've really only been on people's radar for 6 or 7 months. I don't think Ripple and XRP will ever have that same "feeling" as Bitcoin or Ethereum, with a large community (echo chamber?) of people significantly invested in an ideology; that said, as the crypto world grows, I do think new devs will come on-board for the same reasons me and others buy into XRP: the tech is good and it is useful. I also suspect we are only starting to scratch the surface of what can be done with various blockchain technologies, so it will be fun to see everything unfold over the coming years.

PS: thanks for all the work you folks do.

Ripple could take example how NebulousLabs (Sia/Obelisk) inspires the open source community. They have initiated a successful bounty program and regularly host sessions on their inner protocol; promoting (api) usage. Has Ripple/Miguel considered such a bounty program?
